

My short essay on online hate speech

For sure , the general explicit hate speech online should be commenting, whether under somebody's timeline, a journalist's post, somebody's official page ( ect. ) a direct threat, a direct shear outburst of hate like : " Fuck you, you fucking bitch ! " / " I hope you die, you asshole . " / " If I ever get the chance, I'll snap your neck like a twigg !! " / .

I guess, there is an artistic freedom to express yourself but in which context matters. Even from who does the content coming from, with the name and a surname matters.

I don't have any education , some kind of formal education to support myself as a writer or any kind of artist , journalist, politician, PR expert ( whatever ) with knowledge and skills good enough. So as an average person just using Facebook to post a poem for example, my biggest fear is , due to lack of vocabulary, articulated thoughts .. My sentences, my lyrics, my lines are pretty much just short , basic grammar, elementary school writing full of metaphors through that basic expression like " the sky is blue and the grass is green " . And ad I venture into a lot of socially delicate issues it is easy to get me wrong, mean, malicious and full of some kind of hidden agendas. I post my poems on a page called Poemhunter under an alias Late October and a lot of them got reviewed , probably cause somebody reported me as offensive in some kind of matter. I don't think I'm doing something profoundly wrong , even if my lyrics often come out a bit cynical , sarcastic ( among other ) and frankly, to me personally, comical .. Tragicomical even. I got a few comments that my lyrics are mostly trash, vile and worth of contempt , I qoute.

P. S.

I'm sorry if I went to far of the specific subject on online hate speech. I'm not trying to market my own little private writings through this essay . I just feel it's a slippery ground for an amateur like me, not to literate and educated, to accidentally hurt somebody by my lyrics. Maybe it is about stereotypes and people get reminded of a bad experience.
